pdf, which I think can be helpful. A: How about writing a script that calls the $number plus $months to form a valid date? Then use the following regex to replace the months with the correct number. This may still have some issues if the user enters the wrong number of months but you should be able to work it out. $date = str_replace('month', number($months), $date); Last week the Supreme Court ordered a deal that will ban landline phones in India, after the government moved to junk a commitment to provide all landlines with a free basic calling package. The deal is, in a way, a small victory for those of us who think that it would be a shame to let a very successful digital economy fizzle out of existence. The ruling keeps a ban on landlines in place for now, but it also orders the government to ensure that there are no more than two to three hours of free voice calls per month to any individual. The regime established by the government to serve the telecommunications needs of the country has certainly been a mess. It's largely because of this that it has been so easy for private companies to pop up and offer better deals. Much like with other areas of Indian life, the state has been struggling to get people to use new technology. But there are important reasons why this is one of the most important industries to consider. The fundamental economic challenge for the new deal on the mobile industry is how to avoid services being perceived as a luxury by customers. The costs of operating a landline are rising. And in poorer parts of the country, the telecom service has become even less appealing. As competition between different private companies is removed, and more and more consumers turn to mobile-based services, landlines are becoming less appealing. The result is that people will have to pay more for the same or worse service. To protect the revenue from the service, the government has set caps on prices. In some cases, customers are charged for calls to a fixed number. In other cases, even calls to a mobile are capped. And in every case, when customers pay for the service they have to pay for the full cost of calls. The problem is that a lot of people are now using their phones to connect with friends and family. The result is a demand for more and more services. The existing operators are not able to keep up with the volume of calls. And as the number of 82157476af
